

Fort Moultrie SC May 1860

A Fine Collectible Print, with Historical Summary

The first in a new series of plans and views to be produced by Battlefields in Motion, Ltd., from their computer-graphic recreation of Fort Moultrie, the historic Federal stronghold which peacefully stood guard prior to the Civil War on Sullivan's Island, beside the entrance into Charleston Harbor, South Carolina. Within the ensuing months, this stronghold would be strengthened, then forsaken altogether by its Union garrison under Maj. Robert Anderson, before being further altered by its Confederate occupiers under Maj. Roswell S. Ripley to take part in the April 1861 bombardment of Fort Sumter which inaugurated that conflict. Eventually, Moultrie's interior would be almost totally obliterated by Federal shelling during the protracted siege of Charleston, so that only its ramparts still remain standing today.

Yet thanks to modern satellite-imagery and CG technology, a three-dimensional model of this landmark has been created, virtually resurrecting it to its pre-war configuration and appearance. Originally completed as a Second-System coastal defense in December 1809, Moultrie had already undergone numerous alterations and enhancements during the first half-century of its existence, plus extensive repairs following major hurricanes in 1822, 1842, and 1854. By mid-century, its heaviest artillery had become concentrated along its southern shoreline front so as to cover Charleston's sea-approaches, while its inner compound had grown so crowded that members of its peacetime garrison often lived outside its walls.

This beautiful and unique architectural plan, precise in every detail — down to the live-oak trees and hedges which lined Moultrie's Parade Ground in the spring of 1860 — not only constitutes a valuable educational resource, but an eye-pleasing decorative print as well, suitable for either public display or private enjoyment.
